

Caring for Foster Children Who Else Can Provide Care?

Sometimes children need a break from their daily routine. Activities, time with their birth family, and friends can build a child's self-esteem and reduce the stress of separation from their birth family. It's important for you, as a foster parent, to take a break too! Breaks can provide time to recharge, regroup, and refocus which all help prevent burnout.

Foster parents can exercise the reasonable and prudent parent standard to identify an informal care provider for up to seven consecutive days of care. If a child will be with another caregiver for seven to 13 days, that caregiver must be approved through the agency. In both instances, foster parents can select other individuals who they know, trust, and believe will provide a safe place for their foster children. Foster parents may also access formal respite caregivers that are approved foster homes.

Below is a chart comparing requirements between informal and formal respite care providers. As a reminder, please keep your child's worker informed of the child's whereabouts when utilizing other caregivers.
